"When is Mom's birthday?"

"Am I attractive?"

"Does my boss hate me?"

"What time is dinner tonight?"

For patients suffering the affects of Generalized Anxiety Disorder

Lexapro can help silence the worries

Do you suffer from "the worries?"

The worries are those tiny, yet deafening voices that never seem to go away. Sometimes they worsen over time, interrupting your thoughts, disrupting your focus, even devouring your daily life.

Anxiety is a normal part of being human. Running late for an appointment or arguing with a loved one are among the normal occurrences that may lead to feelings of stress and tension. However, when worry becomes a debilitating concern for more than half the days during a six month period or longer—it could be a warning sign that you are suffering the affects of Generalized Anxiety Disorder or GAD as it is also known.

If you suspect that you are suffering from GAD, take the Anxiety Self-Screener at www.Lexapro.com. The results can help you and your doctor determine whether a proper course of treatment, including Lexapro is right for you.

With a low percentage of adverse affects and a high tolerance rate among patients, statistics show that GAD sufferers overwhelmingly stick with Lexapro compared to other treatments.
